Jennifer White grew up in Yankton, South Dakota. While White's upbringing brought many challenges in both home and social environments, art was a major outlet for during her childhood and helped to create a sense of self-worth. White received little training but decided to turn her creative outlet into a disciplined career in 2008. White's work is a narrative of her trials and tribulations expressed through painting. The influence of growing up in both Native and non-native communities is represented in her work as she continues to find inspiration from both cultural experiences.

White strives to bring a new voice to Native work without the influence of the ideals and expectations of non-Native teachings. The artist community has shown her the inner-workings of the art market circuits and taught her how to engage with galleries and museums.
